This year’s competition was tighter than ever. East Meadow earned an average of 62.7 points out of a maximum of 70, narrowly defeating the site of the Patchogue Club with 62.3 points, and the Poughkeepsie Club, with 61 points. There were 15 club web sites that scored more than 50 points.

In the Division competition, Long Island South Central got an average score of 60.3. Long Island South Central has now won the Division competition all three years that the contest has been conducted.

Judging was done by webmasters from other Kiwanis districts in North America. One judge commented that the job took longer than he expected because of the time he ended up spending reading about the club activities around the district.

There were several reasons cited for why web sites didn’t score higher. The most common problem was out of date information -- old event calendars, old lists of officers, and efforts to promote events which had already taken place.

One judge commented that clubs make a mistake putting music on their sites. “Argh! Sound!” was the summary. Music on sites slows them down and distracts from the site’s message.

The following criteria were used for the contest, with each worth 10 points:
- Is the site up to date? Are there any out-of-date references? Are new and upcoming events listed?
- Does the club/division have its own domain name?
- Is a link to the Kiwanis International web site featured?
- Does the site include information of interest to non-members?
